King Edward Hall

The old Christ's Hospital Boy's School site was acquired in 1904 with construction starting a year later. Officially known as the London Chief Office, it was the largest public Post Office in the country, with a counter running the whole length of the ground level hall. The upper floors of the building were used for sorting mail from abroad. The building was acquired in 1997 and totally renovated retaining many of the original features. The ground floor has now become the King Edward Hall which provide a venue for a wide range of events, from business lunches and dinners, conferences, presentations and cocktail receptions. The King Edward Hall has its own street entrance, reception services and audio-visual support facilities. It can accommodate up to 250 guests for a canapé reception or 150 for a seated lunch or dinner.
